Sri Lanka. In 2015, the Sri Lankan government promised to implement a range of measures to address the history of past abuses, to pursue truth and justice, and to provide redress to victims. However, to date, only the Office of Missing Persons has been established. ICTJ provides technical assistance on the implementation of transitional justice processes, and works with a diverse range of victims to amplify their voices and ensure policymakers hear and account for them.

In Asia, from diplomatic tensions between Japan, China and South Korea, to peace agreements that have ended long-running conflicts, such as Aceh's Helsinki Memorandum of Understanding, to on-going mediation efforts in Mindanao and southern Thailand, demands for justice have been far from absent. Yet, at the same time, Asia has received much less attention than Latin America, Africa and Europe within transitional justice scholarship. 1 This imbalance in the literature is unfortunate because ...

Civil Society and Transitional Justice in Asia and the Pacific

The Asia Society, in cooperation with the International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ), has undertaken a series of public programs on transitional justice in Asia. Issues of memory, truth, and reconciliation in the transition of a society toward a multi-ethnic, participatory democracy are explored through the examination of six case studies: Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, East Timor, Indonesia, and Sri Lanka.

The toppling of Ferdinand Marcos in 1986 through a dramatic four days of peaceful demonstrations paved the way for Corazon Aquino's rise to power and a series of initiatives addressing the injustices of Marcos's corrupt, often brutal, and shameless regime. Our experience of transitional justice started out strong, with the power of the people supporting it, but ultimately it failed to address the fundamental institutional obstacles to justice in our country.
